"I know my kids' faces in my head. I can look at them and tell you their favorite color is red or their favorite food is pizza. I can take photos of my kids' birthdays, or of their first day of school. I can take photos of their pets and pet them. I can create a collage of them. That's my favorite part of Photoshop. I can create a piece of art, a collage, a greeting card, a website for the world to see... an online portfolio. I can create a panoramic picture for my house; I can create a panoramic picture for the world to see. I can take my own photos and make them look amazing, for free. I can even make money off my kids."—Jason Mims, independent graphic designer

Q: Is there a hack for the failwhale to be less odious? Is there a way to reduce the text of the failwhale to something more tolerable, or maybe a simple solution to stop seeing it at all, without deleting it? Obviously I can't bother with a flat out edit, but perhaps the failure to notice that it's in the image could just be notened, or the image that popups could be drawn on a mask (like the standard way to achieve a background image). A: The only way I can think of to make it more tolerable is to file a feature-request on SE to disable the entire page when a question fails to generate any up-votes, or at least to make the text less prominent and annoying. However, you have other options available to you. You can upvote the question yourself, which will "reset" the post's reputation and causes the question to become un-highlighted, thus not ruining the page. You can edit the question to add back a link to point to the more basic, less obnoxious close reason. A: Personally, I don't think this is particularly important. It's not something that I'm particularly offended by, nor is it something that I find makes me want to avoid the site. When a question receives a close vote, it's up to that voter to accept or reject the close vote, depending on the reasoning they cited for closing. If they don't like the style of a specific close reason, then they have the choice of leaving a comment under the close reason to explain why they reject the close. Obviously, this isn't a walk-in-the-park type of close vote, but it's up to the voters to explain why they are voting to close the question. Personally, I'm not interested in the event that a question received 10 upvotes before it received a single close vote. It makes no difference to me why the question received 10 upvotes before it was closed, or how any one close vote was cast. If 10 voters gave it 10 upvotes, so be it. If you think the question is on-topic, or has some redeeming quality, then upvote it. Personally, I wouldn't expect someone to click the "Not Constructive" close reason every time they flagged a question as off-topic. It would be the
