The Photoshop website () provides a wealth of resources and training materials for the digital photographer — everything from learning how to use Photoshop to learning Photoshop. GIMP Gimp is an open-source program that enables you to perform most of the same types of tasks that you can perform in Photoshop. It has features similar to those in Photoshop, so it's a good choice if you're looking for a program that's less expensive or simpler to use. Gimp has a highly active developer team, and changes are frequent. For the most up-to-date version of Gimp, visit `www.gimp.org/` or click the `A Getting Started Guide` link at www.gimp.org/docs/user/index.html. Adobe's own online tutorials for Photoshop are available from the Adobe website's Education section at `www.adobe.com/education/photoshop/features/index.html`. In addition, Adobe offers more detailed lessons from Photoshop's Training Room, available at the same URL. The latest version of Gimp can be downloaded from the Gimp website. Visit `www.gimp.org/` or click the link. Gimp is an extremely powerful and full-featured tool, and it's a great place to start if you're a beginner. PhotoWorks Like Photoshop, PhotoWorks from Adobe enables you to perform most of the same types of tasks that you can do in Photoshop. It also features most of the same advanced tools that you can find in Photoshop. You can even use the PhotoWorks program (which is not a separate program, but rather part of Photoshop Extended and the Adobe Creative Suite) to open and edit photos in Photoshop. PhotoWorks is one of Adobe's older programs and features a simple drag-and-drop interface. It is intended more for beginner photographers than for advanced users, but you can still learn some useful tricks. PhotoWorks is not available from Adobe's website but is available from major computer resellers and retailers (such as Amazon). Fundamentals of Digital Photography Like any other type of photography, digital photography requires a solid foundation of knowledge and skills. You may have a good experience with photography, but you can't teach yourself to edit, post-process, and print photos digitally; you need to know the basics. If you have a good grasp Frankly, I'd say NC is in the process of reclaiming their own destiny. But really, it's not about you or your kids, it's about everyone else's kids, the ones who will follow in their footsteps. Frankly, I'd say NC is in the process of reclaiming their own destiny. But really, it's not about you or your kids, it's about everyone else's kids, the ones who will follow in their footsteps. Then again, they've been figuring that out for a while now. Cycling is fun, and really any form of athleticism is a valid route to personal development, but the most effective thing to do is to develop an effective means of personal transportation. More specifically, it is a death trap on the freeway. As for the family-centric argument, I've always been a little uneasy with the idea of having to arrange for an absent parent to support a child, in a way that most people don't expect when they have an absent parent. But the real quandary is the whole idea of raising a family—you know, making decisions about kids' homework and clothing and philosophy and you name it. Ultimately, such decisions end up greatly in the hands of other people. Given that, why not take advantage of all the technological tools at hand. Living in the city, there's no choice but to be a passenger, and for that to be even remotely effective, you need to get out of the way. Many of us will also come to accept that life in the city is not for everyone, or to live somewhere you can't afford. Ultimately, at the end of the day, we're all individualists. We make decisions based on our own interests and ideals, which should really be what matters. What matters is that we are never alone, and that our family, whether it's biological, chosen, or fostered, is the greatest gift we can give ourselves. By the way, I'm a child of divorce—I've been to enough family reunions to know that everyone's family is somewhere. These attitudes not only accept diversity, they depend on it.

Traditionally, most telecommunications systems operate on a circuit switched basis (i.e., for the duration of a call) providing a dedicated end to end connection between the caller and receiver. However, the wireless telecommunications industry is currently investigating packet switched technology for wireless connections, including those used for point to point wireless connections as well as wireless point to multipoint (e.g., multi-cell) connections. Because wireless network connections are typically "re-established" over the air in packet switched format at the outset of each communication session, applications typically include the capability to monitor the quality of the wireless communications link and control the operation of the wireless device to maintain an acceptable quality of service. For example, wireless devices (e.g., cellular telephones) periodically monitor the signal strength of received uplink transmissions to determine whether the transmit/receive (Tx/Rx) link is within a desired signal strength threshold. Traditionally, however, the signal strength of the uplink transmissions are generally measured at the base station subsystem or other point of access to the packet switched wireless network. For example, as shown in FIG. 1, a typical wireless subscriber station 100 performs uplink link monitoring by determining the signal strength of received packets transmitted from a subscriber station over the uplink portion of the wireless network 102. The subscriber station 100 monitors received signal strength indications ("RSSI") for received packets transmitted by the subscriber station 100 in the uplink. The subscriber station 100 generally provides the RSSI data to a base station subsystem 104, and the base station 104 typically analyzes the RSSI data to determine whether the uplink Tx/Rx link is at an acceptable signal level. For example, if the RSSI is greater than a threshold value, then the base station 104 can request the subscriber station 100 to increase the transmission power on the next packet of the session to achieve a desired RSSI level. Some wireless telecommunications standards, however, permit subscribers to configure the wireless device to self-initiate a handover in response to RSSI data received from the base station subsystem 104. For example, some CDMA standards, such as IS-2000, permit wireless devices to transmit a Handover Indication message to the base station subsystem 104 in response to RSSI information received from the base station subsystem 104. More specifically, for example, if a subscriber device 100 determines that an RSSI has dropped below the desired signal level during a particular session, the device 100 can transmit a handover
